The above plant is of the pepper species, and is supposed to possess medicinal and invigorating qualities. In the opinion of medical men best qualified to judge that its use is more injurious than beneficial. It is said to have a desensitizing, stupefying effect on those who use it. Like opium and intoxicating drinks, it has its votaries, and its effects are pernicious. Its use, however, under the stimulus of active license competition, is rapidly extending, and is causing the increase of disease and death, hardly less than do inboatings. The strongest awa is said to be grown in Hana, Maui, and when this can be procured is preferred to all other. The sales on Oahu alone are supposed to be from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars a year. When the sale was restricted to the agent of the Interior Department, the gross receipts are said to have exceeded ten thousand dollars a year.

 accept it if the country demands it.

THE ENGLISH TERROR.—The alarm of the English journals, relative to the late Fenian developments in the north of Ireland, is, in fact, a mere England, a perverted, marauding, illud of a riting and disagreeable revelation to learn that nianism, so far from being a remote Irish-Amer-anomaly, actually penetrates English towns homes. It has been converted from a distant anger into an ever present terror. That thousands armed men should rise in a quiet English city at mysterious secret signal in opposition to the laws, admits a condition of affairs that justifies the dark-forebodings. Fenianism in Ireland may be led by the bayonet, the jail, and the gallows; in England it is a frightful, impalpable spectre terror that strikes every heart. It is no wonder that England is agast at this unexpected manifestation of the standing Irish difficulty. This English Fenian phenomenon is now happily paralleled in history. Our civil war was at first attended by the compensating advantage of moving from the South the constant terror of a slave insurrection. The freedmen have at last taken an interest in the preservation of order as the whites. It is only in the social wars of ancient Greece and Rome that we find a condition of affairs so dark as that which prevails in England. Humanshudders at the periodical massacres of the Huns by their Spartan masters. The social wars of me were more terrible than the campaigns against Carthage and Gaul. Yet now, beneath the disguises of nineteenth century civilization, behold in the wealthiest and most powerful nation of the world, a too palpable reproduction of the worst evils of Pagan society, such as had been believed to have become obsolete with the spread of Christianity. The Irish in England have become a suspected race. Police watch them day and

But, Regiments of soldiers are hurried to the races where they most congregate. How long will it be before a real or supposed necessity of self-preservation precipitates a massacre by soldiers and police; how long will it be before the expected race is driven to bay, and compelled to fight for the poor privilege of existence upon the land on which they are encamped? These considerations agitate the minds of thoughtful Englishmen in connection with the recent Africanian developments. The Irish question must soon be met, and settled once for all. Let us hope

It may be metalled upon principles of justice without outraging humanity. Let Englishmen see if they are competent to investigate and remove the causes that stamp into the hearts of Irishmen in every part of the world a deadly everlasting hatred to England. All history shows that the worst, most costly, and most evanescent of all governments is that of mere brute force. It inevitably raises up a fruitful crop of conspiracies, assassinations, and revolts. The true policy of England is to remove the causes of Irish continent, and then the effects will cease, and Feudalism will disappear.—S. F. Times.
